Pedestrian crossing street hit by oncoming vehicle

$1.1 million verdict

The plaintiff, 42, was a pedestrian who was injured while crossing a street in Waltham. The plaintiff testified that he was in the crosswalk at the time of the incident.

The defendant contended that although the accident was during daylight, his visibility was diminished because it was raining and overcast. The defendant further contended that the plaintiff was not in the crosswalk and, in any event, did not look as he entered the street.

The plaintiff's contention was that the defendant driver took a left turn onto the one-way street too close to the left side of the street, where the plaintiff was crossing.

In addition, the plaintiff argued that if the defendant were to be believed about having taken a left turn in the middle of the intersection, he would have had sufficient opportunity to see the plaintiff.

The plaintiff's reported injuries included a severe calcaneus fracture extending to the subtalar joint, resulting in open reduction internal fixation, and a displaced fracture at the tip of the fibula. The plaintiff developed arthritis in the subtalar joint, and a foot and ankle specialist testified that the plaintiff was a candidate for a fusion of the joint.

The jury returned a verdict of $1.1 million, reduced by the plaintiff's 30 percent comparative negligence. The total award with interest was $943,233.80.
